Go Purple

For over 25 years since TCFV began tracking the number of women killed by their male intimate partner in Texas, we have observed more than 100 women killed annually.¹ In 2015, perpetrators killed 158 women in 53 counties across the state.

How do we prevent these tragedies? TCFV posits a three-fold strategy for solutions:

Know: This report helps our state come to know individual stories and statewide information of intimate partner homicides.

Predict: Equipped with knowledge, TCFV informs the policies and practices that enhances our first responders’ and others’ abilities to predict when violence may escalate.

Prevent: Communities can work together to intervene in potentially lethal cases and form a true commitment to addressing the core societal norms and realities that allow violence to occur.

Know. Predict. Prevent. The map on the left and those TCFV has produced for the last several years supports this idea. It marks the current reality of the number of women killed, allows for comparison over time, and offers a vision for a Texas in which all counties report zero fatalities and thereby GO PURPLE.

Want to participate in helping Texas Go Purple? We know preventing domestic violence fatalities requires a strong commitment to offering victims safe alternatives including access to family violence centers. Join TCFV’s advocacy efforts for full funding for these life-saving centers by submitting a Purple Postcard at TCFV.org/PurplePostcard. Come together with thousands of Texans in calling on legislators to support survivors and service providers in our state.

About Texas Council on Family Violence

Texas Council on Family Violence (TCFV) is the only statewide nonprofit in Texas dedicated solely to creating safer communities and freedom from family violence. With the collective strength of more than 1,000 members, TCFV shapes public policy, equips service providers, and initiates strategic prevention efforts with state-wide reach and direct local impact.

Since 1978, TCFV has been regarded as the statewide expert, think tank and training entity for domestic violence programs and intersecting systems, including civil and criminal justice, child support and welfare, economic and workforce organizations, healthcare and the general public. In 2015, TCFV conducted 32 statewide training events, 40 regional trainings and 104 individualized consultations and customized trainings.

Mission: Texas Council on Family Violence promotes safe and healthy relationships by supporting service providers, facilitating strategic prevention efforts, and creating opportunities for freedom from domestic violence.

Honoring Texas Victims Report Methodology

Each year, TCFV publishes Honoring Texas Victims: Family Violence Fatalities revealing the stories of women killed by their intimate partners in Texas and offering data analysis on the nature of the femicides as they occurred in the previous year. In order to identify all female victims of intimate violence homicides in 2015, TCFV monitored media reports in all 254 Texas counties and reviewed law enforcement and County and District Attorneys’ communication releases. In addition, TCFV researched each femicide case with local community partners. TCFV requested police reports from 33 law enforcement agencies and directly contacted 82 law enforcement departments including sheriff’s offices and homicide, special crimes, and domestic violence units. To collect any missing information TCFV contacted law enforcement and victim counselors to request police reports via the Public Information Act for the domestic violence murder-suicide cases and cases where authorities charged offenders. TCFV contacted prosecutors and victim assistance coordinators to obtain more information for cases in which prosecution occurred. TCFV further contacted family violence programs and reviewed obituaries and social media. As a final review point, TCFV closely examined the Unified Crime Report (UCR) data from the Texas Department of Public Safety. The UCR validated our research and identified an additional 15 female victims reported by specific precincts. TCFV verified the data for the narratives and analysis with the information from official public records and direct communication with local partners. All of these contacts and the breadth of information gathered enriched the detail and depth of our knowledge.

Throughout this Honoring Texas Victims Report we have included quotations from some of the women’s stories as a way to honor their legacy.

“Active member of the community.
Committed her life to showing kindness to those around her.”
The Tragic Reality of Domestic Violence in Texas

Each year, TCFV presents the stories of women killed by their male intimate partners with care and consideration towards both the women killed and their families. In addition, we derive lessons learned from an extensive review of the demographic information and additional pieces of data. The report continues to offer a deeper dive into the following areas: the ages of victims and offenders, the relationship between the victims and the offenders, the location of the murder, the method used to commit the crime, the frequency of fatalities for each month, counties with fatalities, offenders’ involvement within the criminal justice system, murder-suicide and familicide, children and adult witnesses and other related homicides.

Key data points regarding intimate partner homicides in Texas in 2015:

- 158 women killed by their intimate partners represents a 20% increase in intimate partner homicides in just one year and the highest increase on record.
- A man killed his current or former female intimate partner every 2.3 days in Texas.
- Fatalities occurred in 53 counties across the state; 35 counties experienced an increase in the number of fatalities from 2014.
- The county with the highest number of deaths was Harris (34), followed by Dallas (13) Bexar (9), El Paso (9), and Tarrant (6).
- Victims’ ages ranged from 16 to 93; fifteen victims were 70 or older, a 250% increase in elderly victims from 2014.
- 61% of perpetrators used a firearm.
- 78% of perpetrators killed their partners in a home.

These data points illustrate that we know a great deal about intimate partner femicides in Texas. We use these pieces to further employ statewide and community-based approaches to begin to predict lethality and ultimately working to prevent violence.

Know. Predict. Prevent.

“Lovable, caring and full of life.
She was the glue who kept her family together.”
Texas Family Violence in 2015

Clearly and unfortunately, family violence in Texas continues to rise across a variety of markers, from law enforcement response to shelter services to the number of women killed. In 2015, law enforcement responded to more than 500 family violence incidents per day. The total number of reported family violence incidents in Texas last year was 194,872, representing a 4.9% increase from 2014. These incidents involved 211,301 victims and 205,154 offenders. The age group with the highest number of victims was 20 to 24 years.

Along with the law enforcement response, consider that Texas family violence programs served 69,107 adults and children by providing shelter for 24,391 adults and children and nonresidential services to 45,478 adults and children in 2015. 15,869 requests for shelter went unmet due to lack of space, a 7.2% increase from 2014. Contacts to the National Domestic Violence Hotline from Texas residents increased by 28% from 13,298 in 2014 to 17,774 in 2015.

In Texas in 2015, there were 1,314 total homicides, 12% of which were intimate partner femicides by male partners (158). Forty-nine percent of all female homicide victims in Texas were killed by a male intimate partner.

Nationwide women are most often killed by a family member or an intimate partner. In fact, women experience a 16 times greater likelihood of murder by a male acquaintance than by a male stranger. In Texas, women face considerably more likelihood of murder by an intimate partner as compared to men.

For every femicide in the U.S., there are 8-9 attempted femicides.

2 Id.
Comparing changes in the overall homicide rate with the intimate partner femicides illustrates that when violent crime increases in the state overall, lethal violence against women increases even more significantly, often increasing as much as two to three times the homicide rate. In the previous chart, note that in 2015, Texas experienced an 11% increase in all homicides compared to a 20% increase in homicides of women killed by their intimate partners. Contrastingly, in 2014, when homicides increased by 3%, homicides of women killed by their intimate partners increased 11%. Similar trends repeat in 2012-2013.

Risk and Attaining Safety from Abusive Partners

Relationship Status

In 2015, the most common relationship between perpetrator and victim was husband and wife (48%) followed by boyfriend and girlfriend (32%). Former boyfriend-girlfriend relationships comprised 17% of the represented relationships, consistent with 2014, and divorced couples represented 3%.

The majority of victims were still married or in a dating relationship with the men who killed them, and 37% of the women had ended or taken steps to end their relationships. This figure includes the 27 ex-girlfriends, five ex-wives, and 19 married women who were leaving or separated from their husbands and seven women who were in the process of leaving their boyfriends when killed.

In 2015, five women seeking divorce completed the process prior to their murders; this report lists these victims as ‘ex-wives’. This follows similar patterns over the past ten years. On average, ‘ex-wives’ comprise 4.5% of victims each year. A more thorough examination of why the number of divorced men who kill their partners is significantly lower than men in other stages of their relationship would help inform an understanding of what risk factors exist for women leaving relationships and the distinctive circumstances of fatalities when ex-husbands kill their former partners.

Compared to other women in abusive relationships, women who leave their abusive partners are 3.6 times more likely to be killed in the period of time immediately after their separation. After three months and then again after one year from separation, the risk of lethal violence decreases. All abusive relationships pose some level of risk and dangerousness whether the relationship has ended or not and despite the amount of time that has passed.

11 Id.
12 Id.
Although overall risk of femicide decreases as time from separation passes, previous Honoring reports documented cases of women killed by the ex-husbands after years of separation. Those working with survivors should always listen and respond to the survivor’s own assessments of risk and safety concerns.

Reports of intimate partner fatalities do not routinely indicate whether the victims sought services through domestic violence programs or pursued civil or criminal legal remedies to address safety concerns. Although TCFV does not have a complete picture of the number of victims who sought services before death, we have critical details on decisions the women made about their relationships and the escalating responses of their abusive partners. The 2015 Honoring Report documents:

- Ten perpetrators killed their partners during the victims’ early planning process to end the relationship.
- Three perpetrators killed their partners as the victims fled their homes to protect themselves.
- In 16 cases, law enforcement responded to domestic violence calls days and weeks before the fatalities. In some cases, calls were made the day of the murders.
- In at least 10 cases, the perpetrators had pending charges or investigations for previous assaults against the women they ultimately killed.
- Seven women had sought family violence services.
- Two perpetrators killed their partners immediately after the women refused to reunite with their abusive ex-partners.
- Eleven men killed their partners during custody exchanges and other post-separation contacts.

Women have valid and logical reasons to maintain contact with their abusive ex-partners. Some survivors may have determined that contact with their abusive partner/ex-partner could enhance their safety; for example when a survivor spends time with the batterer, she knows where he is and what he is doing during that period. Decision making around children or legally mandated requirements in custody agreements also play a significant role in ongoing contact. In 2015, 11 men killed their partners during custody exchanges and other post-separation contacts. Some of the women had attempted to increase their safety by meeting for the custody exchanges in public places like restaurants, convenient stores, or neutral places such as family members’ homes.

Ultimate Expressions of Power and Control: Firearms, Strangulation and Escalating Physical Violence

Nationwide, women killed by their intimate partners are more likely to be murdered with a firearm than with all other means combined. This continues to be true in Texas as well. In 2015, 96 men (61%) used firearms to kill their intimate partners. Twenty-three men (14%) stabbed and killed their partners, 19 men (12%) assaulted their partners with their hands or other objects, and 11 men (7%) strangled and killed their partners. Four men suffocated their partners, four men used their vehicles to kill their partners and one man drowned his partner. Seven of these attacks involved multiple means of assault.

Physical violence and threats of physical violence reinforce the emotional, verbal, and financial tactics of control that batterers use to maintain power over their partners. The primary risk factor for intimate partner femicide is physical violence against the victim. Strangulation is also a significant lethality risk factor. Victims who experience strangulation are at much higher risk of death by their abusive partners. Some studies indicate that strangulation occurs in later stages of abusive relationships as violence escalates.

A recent study documents the extent to which batterers use firearms to intimidate and coerce their partners. Four and a half million women reported that their abusive partners threatened them with a gun in order to coerce or force their compliance and one million women have been shot and wounded.

In a survey of callers to the National Domestic Violence Hotline, 22% of women reported that their partners had threatened to use a gun to kill them, a family member, friend, or pet, or threatened to use a firearm to commit suicide and 10% said their partner had fired a gun during an argument.

Women who survive strangulation are at significantly higher risk of being the victim of homicide or attempted homicide.

Women experiencing domestic violence are eight times more likely to be killed if there is a gun in the home.

Means of Death

- Shot: 61%
- Stabbed: 15%
- Beaten: 12%
- Strangled: 7%
- Other: 5%

4.5 million women in the U.S. have been threatened with a firearm by their intimate partners.

19 Id.
Preventing domestic violence perpetrators from having access to firearms reduces a threat to the larger public. Point of fact: an analysis of mass shootings between 2009 and 2015 indicates that the perpetrator killed an intimate partner or other family member in 57% of the cases. In 15% of the cases, the perpetrator had a prior domestic violence charge. Moreover, firearms and domestic violence pose a significant risk to responding law enforcement officers. Between 2010 and 2014, 22% of officer deaths in the line of duty occurred while responding to domestic violence calls, making them the most dangerous type of call officers received.

Ages of Victims and Offenders

The ages of women killed by their intimate partners in 2015 cross the lifespan; the youngest victim was 16 and the oldest victim was 93. Seventy-two percent of victims (114) were younger than 45; 44 victims were older than 45. Victims ages 30-39 (46) represent the most prevalent age group, followed by victims ages 20-29 (42) and then by victims ages 40-49 (37).

The youngest perpetrator of intimate partner femicide in 2015 was 17; the oldest was 93. Offenders ages 40-49 (41) represent the most prevalent age group, followed by offenders ages 30-39 (40) and then by offenders ages 20-29 (31).

In aggregate, the age ranges of perpetrators tends to peak in older ages than those of victims. When broken down into five-year increments, the number of victims in each age category exceeds the number of offenders before age 40-44. Then from age 45 the number of offenders in each age category is equal to or exceeds the number of victims, with the exception of the ages 70-74. One hundred offenders were older than the women they killed, with 55% of them five or more years older. Twenty-eight percent of victims (44) were older than the offender who killed them. Fourteen victims were the same age as the offender who killed them.

Compared with other age groups, there is a significant increase of intimate partner homicides from teen to young adult years. In 2015 perpetrators killed four women under the age of 19 and 18 women between the ages of 20-24. Twelve victims under the age of 24 were younger than their perpetrators; eight of those perpetrators were nine to 25 years older than their victims. On average victims under 24 were five years younger than their perpetrator while overall victims were on average 3.25 years younger than their perpetrators.

These figures support the reality that efforts taken to reduce intimate partner homicides necessitate an understanding of risk factors related to age.

The number of women killed by their intimate partners continues to spike into late twenties, thirties and early forties, with significant decreases after age 50. Some factors that could influence higher rates of homicides between the ages of 20-49 are pregnancy, child-rearing, and likelihood of divorce.

Survivors experience a range of pressure, coercion, threats and violence from their abusive partners related to pregnancy.25 Homicides represent the leading cause of death during pregnancy and the first year post-partum; current or former intimate partners commit 54% of homicides of pregnant women, with these femicides most often occurring in the first trimester of pregnancy.26 In 2015, six Texas victims (3.7%) were pregnant when the perpetrators killed them. They ranged in ages from 18 to 35. In two of the cases, the perpetrators attempted to pressure the victims to end their pregnancies and the motive for the murders centered on the offenders not wanting the pregnancy to continue. Nine victims, ranging in ages from 21 to 38, were in their first year post-partum, including one victim who placed her newborn with an adoptive parent because her abusive partner did not want to be a parent. This data further illustrates that incorporating universal education about healthy and unhealthy relationships27 combined with client-centered domestic violence screening practices within healthcare settings can offer life-saving interventions and improve maternal and child health outcomes.28

Raising children is another lifespan issue that factors into a survivor’s decision making about staying in or leaving abusive relationships and often requires remaining in contact with their abusive partners. In 2015, 108 women were mothers to 281 minor and adult children.

Of the 108 mothers, 79 women were mothers to 188 minor and young adult children.

Mothers of minor and young adult children ranged in ages from 18 to 49 and account for 61% of all victims killed. One victim was 18, 28 victims were between the ages of 20-29, 44 women were between the ages of 30-39, and 16 women were between the ages of 40-49.

Given that the risk of lethal violence increases for women who leave abusive partners,29 we examined the correlation between the age of women seeking divorces in Texas and the age of women who are killed by their intimate partners. Within the general Texas population, women between the ages of 25-49 were more likely to seek a divorce than women in other age groups.30 In Texas, 75% of women who were granted a divorce and 68% of women who were killed by their intimate partners (107) were between the ages of 25 and 49.\textsuperscript{31} Our analysis of relationship status in the previous section indicates that women whose divorces are finalized are less likely to be victims of intimate partner femicide than women in other stages of their relationships. However, the rise in the divorce rate in women ages 25-49 suggests that this is a time of life when more women are likely to end their relationships. There is no formal data collection of women who end dating relationships; therefore, we are unable to determine if unmarried women in this age group are more likely to end their relationships as well. Decision making about staying in or ending an abusive relationship is likely a significant factor in the higher rates of women killed in their 20s, 30s, and 40s.

The number of victims killed over the age of 70 elevates the need to consider issues faced by the elderly. In 2015, 15 victims were 70 or older, a 250% increase from 2014. In 13 of these homicides, the perpetrators also killed themselves. In six of these cases, either the victims or the perpetrators experienced terminal illnesses or other significant health concerns. In those cases, family members indicated that the couple’s relationships did not have signs of domestic violence. They are included because the husband killed his intimate partner and to highlight the need to provide better options and support for the aging population. Domestic violence awareness efforts and community outreach should include comprehensive and tailored services to elderly adult victims and perpetrators.

\textit{Counties where IPV Femicides Occurred}

In 2015, intimate partner femicides occurred in 53 counties in Texas. Harris County, which includes the city of Houston, had 34 femicides, the largest number in any county this year. This represents an increase from 2014 when Harris had 23 femicides. Dallas County, which includes the city of Dallas, had 13 femicides in 2015. This represents an increase from 10 in 2014. Bexar County, which includes the city of San Antonio and El Paso County, which includes the city of El Paso, each had nine femicides, representing an increase of four fatalities in each of those communities. Tarrant County, which includes the cities of Arlington and Fort Worth, had six femicides in 2015, a decrease from 10 in 2014. No femicides occurred in Arlington, a city that normally records two to three fatalities each year.

Seventy-five percent of intimate partner femicides in 2015 (118) occurred in urbanized areas across the state that have populations of more than 200,000 and include the following counties: Bell (2), Bexar (9), Brazoria (2), Brazos (1), Cameron (1), Collin (3), Dallas (13), Denton (2), El Paso (9), Fort Bend (3), Galveston (3), Harris (34), Hidalgo (3), Jefferson (2), Lubbock (3), McLennan (3), Montgomery (3), Nueces (4), Smith (2), Tarrant (6), Webb (3), Travis (4), and Williamson (3). Fifteen fatalities occurred in areas of the state that have populations of 100,000 to 200,000, including the counties of: Ector (1), Grayson (2), Gregg (1), Guadalupe (2), Hays (1), Midland (2), Potter/Randall\textsuperscript{32} (5), and Taylor (1).

Together, fatalities in areas of the state with populations over 100,000 account for four out of every five Texas femicides in 2015. Given that the majority of femicides occur in the parts of the state with the highest population concentrations, we can anticipate that as population density increases, the number of intimate partner homicides will rise. In order to prevent continued increases of intimate partner fatalities in Texas, efforts must focus on solutions for urban communities while not losing sight of the particular needs of rural communities.

Further Points of Analysis

Location

In 2015, 123 of the 158 perpetrators (78%) killed their partners or ex-partners in a home. In the majority of cases the specific area of the house was not reported. Of the cases where this specific information was available, the most common location within the home was the bedroom. Twenty-two fatalities occurred in public places including nursing homes and hospitals, parking lots, streets and highways, and remote areas such as creeks and rural roads. Five fatalities occurred in vehicles and four fatalities occurred in workplaces. Locations of four fatalities were not disclosed or determined.

Month

On average a man killed his female intimate partner every 2.3 days in Texas in 2015. The highest number of fatalities in 2015 occurred in April (19), followed by November and December (17). The least amount of fatalities occurred in October (5), followed by September (9) and March (10). Seven fatalities occurred in the third week of April; this is the highest number of fatalities in any one week in 2015. Some homicides clustered around holidays in 2015. Six fatalities occurred the week of Memorial Day at the end of May, five fatalities occurred on and immediately following Thanksgiving in November, and seven homicides occurred the last two weeks of December during the period of winter holidays.

In a comparison of data from 2011-2015, December emerges as a month with a higher rate of fatalities and September as the month with the lower numbers of fatalities. December was the month with the highest number of fatalities in 2014 and 2012 and the month with the second highest number of fatalities in 2011, 2013, 2014, and 2015.
Offender Status

Fifty-eight percent of perpetrators (92) are or were involved in the criminal justice system. Of those, 15 have been sentenced or convicted and 77 have been charged. Thirty-six percent of perpetrators (58) committed suicide. This represents a 5% decrease from 2014 and more closely matches the rate reported in 2013, when 35% of perpetrators committed suicide. Law enforcement officers killed two perpetrators and six perpetrators remain at large. Thirty-one percent of perpetrators (49) had a known history of violence.

Murder/Suicide

In this report, TCFV defines murder-suicide as incidents where perpetrators kill their intimate partners and then kill themselves. Familicide describes incidents when a perpetrator kills his current or former intimate partner and one or more of the couple’s children before committing suicide. In 2015, 36% of perpetrators (58) committed murder-suicides. Three other offenders attempted suicide and survived their injuries. No familicides occurred in 2015, since perpetrators who killed their current or former partners as well as one or more children did not commit suicide and instead were apprehended and charged.

Intimate Partner Abuse Impacts the Entire Community

In 2015, perpetrators killed 108 women who were mothers; 281 children and adults lost their mothers. Of the 281, 61% were children, teens and young adult children.

Most media reports of intimate partner murders do not report the exact number of witnesses present and this information can prove difficult to capture from other sources. With this in mind, we confirm at least 101 adults and children witnessed perpetrators attack and kill their intimate partners. In addition, perpetrators injured nine family members and friends who witnessed the murders.

Perpetrators also killed 19 family members and friends, demonstrating that intimate partner murders carry with them a broader impact. We list these victims by their name, age, and relation to the woman killed.

Key Practices to Accomplish Access for Survivors with Limited English Proficiency

Survivors with limited English proficiency face additional barriers when attempting to access legal remedies. A national survey found that this often includes a delay in process, misunderstandings about the survivor’s statements, and the survivor not receiving key information.\(^3\) Given that 34.9% of Texas’s population speaks a language other than English at home, this represents a critical access consideration for victims of family violence.\(^4\) We know that in 2015 one of the victims in this report faced language access barriers when she attempted to obtain a protective order, an important safety tool. Without interpreter services she did not understand the process to obtain a protective order.

The lack of assistance this victim received represents an all too common reality. The lack of certified interpreters provided to LEP victims exacerbates this problem; some jurisdictions even require the victim to pay for her own interpreter or use her advocate or a family member - sometimes unfortunately including the child of the parties. Without meaningful interpretive access, victims face participation in a confusing and non-transparent system, in a language they do not understand.

Communities should come together to develop policies and procedures in line with providing equal access to LEP victims. This report offers the following strategies to employ in addressing these challenges.

First off, make sure all community partners understand the law. Recipients of federal funds must comply with federal law. Relevant in this setting, most counties and by extension criminal justice system officials in Texas including courts and prosecutors obtain federal funding which carries with it the requirement to offer people with LEP equal access to interpretation, translation and auxiliary aids.

- Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 prohibits discrimination on the basis of national origin. Disparate treatment of LEP system participants may be a type of national origin discrimination.
- Executive Order 13166, issued in 2000 requires meaningful compliance with Title VI by developing a plan for effective serving LEP survivors.
- The Americans With Disabilities Act mandates providing American Sign Language (ASL) interpreters or auxiliary aids to ensure effective communication with D/deaf and hard of hearing individuals.

More specifically all agencies that receive funding through Violence Against Women Act grants must certify that they do not charge a family violence victim “any costs associated” with protective orders. Further, Texas law explicitly states that no fees can be charged to an applicant by any government official or employee, which should include interpreters. Texas statutes also require the court to assess all protective order costs against the abusers in most cases, which would include meaningful interpretive access to guarantee equal access to justice.

In working within the criminal and civil justice system, explaining these federal and state requirements helps to contextualize the importance our country and state place on LEP access. Consistent with these requirements, the Victims of Crime Act, VAWA and other federal and state funding streams support LEP victim services across a variety of contexts. For more on these opportunities, contact TCFV.

Promising Practices

Collaborations Between CPS and Family Violence Programs

Often abused parents find their families in the child welfare system or other systems designed to advocate for children in harm’s way. Nationally, families in which one parent is a victim of family violence are twice as likely to have a substantiated case of child abuse compared to families without family violence. In Texas, over one-third of confirmed Child Protective Services (CPS) investigations in 2015 included a history of family violence¹ - a statistic that has remained unchanged for the last three years.

We know that survivors of family violence and their children need tailored advocacy and safety planning to promote healing, resiliency, and family safety. We also know that perpetrators of family violence require specialized parenting and family violence intervention programs to promote behavioral and cognitive changes that support family stability.² Thus, over the last several years, TCFV has doubled efforts to proactively partner with CPS at the state and local levels. This work aims to reach and support CPS liaisons at local programs and offer ongoing technical assistance to enhance the role of the liaison and bolster programs’ work with survivor parents and their children.

Partnership between the domestic violence community and CPS has propelled specific and long awaited policies forward. Disposition Guidelines pertaining to the investigative findings in CPS cases involving domestic violence went into effect in May of 2015. Following this, CPS leadership and every front line worker across the state received training on the new guidelines. In addition, for the first time, the Texas Administrative Code rules regarding CPS Investigations explicitly address cases involving survivor parents, providing clear direction on where responsibility and accountability falls in families where a parent is a perpetrator of domestic violence.

Strategic efforts to elevate advocacy with survivor parents and their children include support to four pilot sites in Texas: Denton, Rio Grande Valley, Austin and El Paso, to enhance collaboration with CPS in their communities. The first year evaluation of the work of these pilot sites found that CPS staff in these communities gained a better understanding of the dynamics of domestic violence, particularly around the reasons a survivor parent might stay in an abusive relationship and how this parent’s actions can be protective to her children. Further, the evaluation emphasized the promising approach of an Enhanced CPS Liaison playing a key role in improving collaboration between the domestic violence program and CPS.³

Moving forward, TCFV continues efforts at the statewide level to bring new policy and effective promising practices to scale and equip advocates throughout Texas with training and tools to serve families and advocate with community partners to increase survivor parent and child safety.

Safe Custody Exchanges

As women attempt to navigate an abusive relationship with a partner they share children with they frequently face several difficult choices. Women who have made a decision to leave an abusive partner receive mixed messages in this context with some institutions like courts and agencies that prioritize child support encouraging and even mandating a relationship with batterer fathers.\(^4\) Our state can improve the level of resources and support systems available to keep the women and children safe in the process, helping to avoid increasing danger and sometimes lethal outcomes. Because court systems cannot offer ongoing protection for victims and their children during court ordered custody exchanges and visitation requirements, for many women navigating the custody, visitation, and exchange process within the legal system represents a daunting task with tremendous risks.

In communities without safe visitation centers, advocates suggest child visitation exchanges occur in public places or police stations; however, we know that even exchanges in public do not guarantee safety. In fact, two of the five murders in Texas in 2015 that involved a custody exchange occurred in public places: a restaurant and gas station. Overall, eleven children witnessed their mother’s murder during custody exchanges. Clearly women and children need better, safer solutions for custody exchanges with their abusive partners.

PlanetSafe in Austin and Faith and Liberty’s Place Family Center based in Dallas stand as model examples of communities with safe places for custody exchanges. A collaborative with SAFE and Travis County, PlanetSafe concentrates on families in which a parent has a history of family violence, stalking, and/or sexual assault. Fourteen local stakeholders in Austin and Travis County came together to create the model for PlanetSafe with the visitation center opening in 2013. Families that have determined either through the courts or on their own that they need a third party to supervise or facilitate exchanges pay nothing for the service. PlanetSafe offers staggered arrival and departure times, separate entrances and waiting rooms, security personnel, and a child friendly space. In 2015, PlanetSafe served 74 families and provided 400 supervised visits and 298 exchanges. Ninety percent of victims reported feeling safe using the PlanetSafe service.\(^5\)

The Faith and Liberty Place Family Center likewise creates a safe, child-centered environment where trained professionals facilitate supervised child visitation and monitor exchanges with the non-custodial parents. The referrals come directly from the Dallas Family Courts, primarily from child custody cases in which one parent has a history of abusive behaviors toward the other parent and/or child. Staff trained on the dynamics of family violence, victim safety, and offender accountability provide one on one monitoring and observation of parenting time. Staff starts by completing in-person interviews and orientations with both parents as well as the children who will utilize their services. The staff thoroughly examines family dynamics, safety and risk factors. The facility also operates as a supportive visitation center and provides parents life skills and parenting techniques. In 2015, they served 153 families and 591 individuals. Evaluations from the Center demonstrate 86% of victims felt safe while they were at Center and 91% of the children felt the visitation was a positive experience.\(^6\)

From lessons learned at these service providers and in other communities, advocates have come to understand that victims of family violence need access to supervised child visitation and exchange centers. Moreover, centers must train staff on the complexities and dangers of family violence and provide onsite security, separate entrances, and staggered arrival times for the victim and the offender. TCFV stands ready to support communities as they seek resources and solutions for safe visitation and custody exchanges.

Beyond Screening: Engaging Healthcare Professionals at the Texas Health Summit

This year’s report tells the stories of the six pregnant women who were killed by their intimate partner. Additionally, over 25% of the women in this report left behind young children. While we know that pregnancy is a pivotal time for a woman to interact with the healthcare system, we also know that women across the life spectrum engage with the healthcare system for themselves and their children. Knowing this, domestic violence advocates have increasingly utilized this distinctive intersection to support the health care community in promoting healthy, violence free relationships and in intervening when relationships are unsafe.

For instance, TCFV has prioritized engaging the health care community on a statewide level in order to align medical systems and domestic violence advocacy in supporting domestic violence victims and their young children. The 2014 Honoring Texas Victims Report, chronicled the work of a legislatively mandated task force (The House Bill 2620 Task Force) charged with examining the intersections of health and domestic violence. That task force report outlined several recommendations for health care providers, health care systems, domestic violence advocates, and other community stakeholders. It also included findings from a survey developed to gauge the state of domestic violence education in health care settings as well as a white paper outlining the state of the research around domestic violence and healthcare.

Building on the momentum established through participation in the Task Force, TCFV convened a group of nurses, practitioners, advocates, researchers, educators, and other stakeholders in two days of learning and action planning associated with implementing the Task Force’s recommendations. Beyond Screening: Texas Health Summit offered an opportunity for individuals representing diverse perspectives in healthcare to come together for one common purpose: intervening in cases of domestic violence and preventing violence from occurring in the first place. Using the Task Force report as the starting point, three working groups, education, research, and services, identified a path forward for statewide work in their respective areas.

1) Education: The education working group committed to the idea that curricula in medical schools and residency programs should include topics related to domestic violence as well as included in regular continuing education opportunities for health care practitioners. The group focused much of its discussion on next steps including follow up surveys to medical schools and the development of educational materials.

2) Research: The research working group primarily recognized the need for research that integrated primary prevention principles and strategies into the health care-family violence discourse. They discussed ways to prioritize increased collaboration in developing research agendas and collecting data and committed to identifying opportunities for these collaborative efforts.

3) Services: The services working group identified a variety of forums, opportunities, and models already in place and discussed the need for new kinds of systems that would focus on comprehensive care. Some of the key discussions included: 1) incorporating domestic violence on regional advisory councils on trauma, 2) creating a network of survivor health advocates, 3) working on ways to transfer information from one provider to another and, 4) working with health care settings in identifying gaps in training and information.

Participants in all three groups agreed to continuing this work for the long haul and working toward implementing the actions items they identified. The infusing of information about the prevention and intervention of domestic violence into health care practices ranks as a longer term effort requiring the commitment and passion of various stakeholders in the health care community. Beyond Screening: The Texas Health Summit stands as a shining example of how bringing multiple and diverse stakeholders together for “big thinking” can lead to new and fresh ideas and positions Texas well to better respond to and prevent domestic violence across our state.

Use of Cameras to Assist Prosecution of Family Violence Incidents

For some time now, TCFV has increasingly focused on working with prosecutors to facilitate and guide conversations amongst those Texas professionals related to the way that they address family violence in their everyday work (see previous Promising Practice, Next to the Jury Box: A Summit for Prosecutors from the 2013 Honoring Texas Victims Report for more detail). In that effort, a few significant or promising approaches to prosecuting family violence have emerged, chief of which include “victimless prosecution”. Advocates and victims have long agreed that participation in the criminal justice process too often re-victimizes or at least re-traumatizes victims.

With this in mind, prosecutors have increasingly identified the use of video camera recordings of family violence victims’ stories at the scene of the crime to capture her experience and reality as close to the occurrence of the offense as possible. A few particular prosecutors including El Paso’s Jaime Esparza, New Braunfels’ Jennifer Tharp, College Station’s Jarvis Parsons and Corpus Christi’s Mark Skurka have for a few years now incorporated this new tool into their efforts at holding offenders accountable. Working with law enforcement, these and other prosecutors developed protocols and approaches for implementing the use of the cameras into investigation and ultimately prosecution, which other prosecutors can adapt and use in their own communities. For instance, they worked through how to collaborate with law enforcement in regular and continued training, when and how to interview the victim and witnesses, how to download the recordings and various other practical pieces. Importantly, these recordings have spurred more pleas of guilty regardless of whether the victim participates in the criminal prosecution process, a result that increases safety for her and fosters her long-term ability to move forward from abuse while the system holds the offender accountable.

These practices continue to gain support in that the Governor’s Office has lifted up the use of hand held video cameras in family violence on-scene investigation as a promising practice across the state. In support of this effort the Governor has funded cameras for prosecutors and supported formal research on outcomes stemming from their increasing usage. Jurisdictions as diverse as Ector, Hidalgo amongst others received 435 cameras for 18 different jurisdictions, representing 27 counties across the state.

Importantly, the use of video recordings of family violence victims continues to evolve. Although the practice has yielded important positive results, TCFV and its allied prosecutors continue to grapple with and work through how best to protect victim privacy, the length and scope of questions at the scene, and whether and how such recordings actually come into evidence at trial. That said, weighing all of these considerations, this victimless prosecution approach has contributed to a significant paradigm shift for family violence prosecution in Texas.

Coordinated Community Response Efforts

The narratives in this edition of Honoring Texas Victims include the stories of women killed by their male intimate partners even after they came into contact with various systems that respond to family violence. These systems include everything from law enforcement and prosecution to education and Child Protective Services. In all of these cases we are left wondering what could have been done differently to support these women before it was too late. How can systems work together to craft responses that leverage the strengths of the various parts of our criminal and civil justice system, social services, education, business community, communities of faith and any other potential touch points for a victim of domestic violence, her family and her batterer? One answer: coordinated community response (CCR) that seeks better connection between the various systems in order to better identify and intervene in cases of family violence. Although many kinds of CCR exist, Texas has highlighted four specific approaches.

Domestic Violence High Risk Teams

During the election in the fall of 2014, then candidate and now Governor Abbott highlighted Domestic Violence High Risk Teams (DVHRT) in his campaign platform; once in office, the Governor, accomplished, with TCFV’s support, an appropriation and codification of DVHRT’s in Texas law. In this version of a CCR, response partners including law enforcement, prosecutors, the courts, advocates, and other relevant partners come together on a regular basis to assess the degree of risk in a given case (using an assessment tool), to appropriately share information regarding the victim and offender and the case overall, and to fashion intervention strategies for keeping the victim safe and accomplishing offender accountability. In other parts of the country, communities have provided data for evidence-based review of DVHRTs with significantly positive results. A new idea for Texas, TCFV stands poised to use the funding from the Governor as well as other available funding streams to foster the promulgation of DVHRTs in the coming months and years.

Lethality Assessment Programs

Across the state of Texas, several communities have adopted Lethality Assessment Programs (LAP). First created by the Maryland Network Against Domestic Violence, LAP has proven useful in key communities in Texas including Dallas, Corpus Christi, Plano, and College Station. In a nutshell, law enforcement uses a tool for assessing lethality at the scene of the investigation of the offense. Law enforcement then immediately contacts the local family violence center in order to offer real time help from domestic violence advocates for victims that complete the assessment and score above a threshold amount. Moreover, the protocols call for prioritized entrance into a domestic violence shelter or other resources like counseling for victims who score high on the LAP. The implementation of this approach requires in-depth coordination primarily between law enforcement and family violence centers and also includes support from prosecutors, the courts and other community stakeholders.

Domestic Violence Fatality Review

Of the CCRs covered here, Domestic Violence Fatality Reviews (DVFR) represents the one used in Texas for the longest period. After passage of legislation in the year 2000, communities created DVFR to review fatalities in a non-judgmental and supportive environment. DVFRs have the express purpose of identifying and implementing potential changes to the manner in which various systems handle family violence. Communities across Texas have made important changes to the way they handle cases including earlier and more comprehensive interventions, connecting the dots of abuse across contexts, and recognizing the importance of shelter and resource access in reducing the likelihood of domestic violence escalation. This important effort requires significant and long-term collaboration.

Firearms Surrender Protocols

Finally, the introduction of Firearms Surrender Protocols represents an emerging trend in Texas. As a threshold matter, misdemeanor family violence offenders and respondents in protective orders may not legally possess firearms. Although judges, prosecutors, law enforcement and probation officers all possess varying legal abilities to do so, the state law does not specifically cover this. A few communities have determined that developing a community response to firearms surrender, provides the best opportunity for success. Dallas, Travis and Bexar Counties have taken this life saving effort to heart and created varying levels of surrender protocols based on best practices developed across the country and in El Paso specifically. Additional communities continue to explore how to implement protocols as well.

The four CCR approaches offer a glimpse into the current state of community based interventions in Texas. Look to TCFV for resources and support in helping to implement these strategies or others that have developed organically in your community.

Women Killed by Their Intimate Partner in Texas in 2015

The Texas Council on Family Violence lists with great respect the names of each victim of intimate partner femicide in 2015. As TCFV gathered data, we took care to confirm the accuracy of information through various means, primarily law enforcement, Department of Public Safety, media, and family violence programs in Texas. Each confirmed fatality includes the date of the woman’s death and the city in which she was killed, followed by a short description of the circumstances. To increase awareness of lethality risk factors, TCFV includes additional relevant information when available through media and law enforcement reports. The narratives list victims in order by county where the femicide occurred.

ANGELINA COUNTY

Jennifer Ingram, 29
Lufkin // February 5, 2015

Joshua Ingram, 31, shot and killed his wife Jennifer in the bedroom of their home. Ingram fled the scene, contacted his mother, and confessed to killing Jennifer. Ingram’s mother notified authorities, who then discovered Jennifer’s body and later arrested and charged Ingram with murder. Authorities also found Jennifer’s infant son on the bed next to her, unharmed. Jennifer is survived by her three sons, ages 3 months, 4, and 8.
