Honoring Texas Victims

FAMILY VIOLENCE FATALITIES IN 2011
Dedication

TCFV dedicates this report to the four Gonzalez children:
Sean, Daniel, Miguel and infant Cecilia. As you may note, TCFV has not included this murder in the narratives because thankfully Laura Gonzalez survived. Yet this story must be told. Jose Avila shot his wife Laura Gonzalez three times before turning the gun on his four young children and then killing himself. A young girl called 911 for help as she walked home from school that afternoon. This senseless act of violence stole the innocence of four young children and the young people who bore direct witness. It challenges our collective strength, bolstering our determination to create a safer Texas.
The small community of Bay City still mourns this tragedy as does Texas for these family violence deaths and the 102 women killed in 2011.
Executive Overview

The Texas Council on Family Violence (TCFV) presents Honoring Texas Victims: Family Violence Fatalities in 2011. Since 1990, TCFV has marked the loss of 2,632 Texas women killed as a result of family violence. This report focuses on key distinguishing characteristics of these most serious family violence cases. By examining the circumstances leading up to the deaths and identifying common characteristics, we can influence community and policy decisions, inform response to domestic violence, and strengthen services to Texas families. TCFV releases this information with sincere and heartfelt respect to the families impacted.

As context for this report, Chapter 71 of the Texas Family Code defines family violence as “1) an act by a member of a family or household against another member of the family or household that is intended to result in physical harm, bodily injury, assault, or sexual assault, or that is a threat that reasonably places the member in fear of imminent physical harm, bodily injury, assault, or sexual assault, but does not include defensive measures to protect oneself, 2) abuse by a member of a family or household toward a child of the family or household; and 3) dating violence…”  The criminal justice system including law enforcement, prosecutors and judges use this definition of family violence to prosecute cases.

TCFV identifies the impact of all forms of violence, including psychological and emotional abuse. As such, we define domestic violence as a pattern of coercive behavior in a relationship that is used to gain or maintain power and control over an intimate partner. The abuser continually works towards domination of the victim, wants all the power in the relationship and uses violence and other tactics in order to establish and maintain authority and power. Although some perpetrators of domestic violence can be labeled as “sick” or “deranged,” most perpetrators have learned the abusive, manipulative techniques and behaviors that facilitated their domination and control of their intimate partner.

Texas women were killed by their husband, ex-husband, intimate partner, boyfriend or ex-boyfriend.

26 of the victims’ family, friends and co-workers were killed during the same incidents.

Honoring Texas Victims: Family Violence Fatalities in 2011 pays tribute to these victims.

1 Tex. Family Code § 71.004.
These figures come with a backdrop of less lethal but still debilitating forms of family violence. Every year, more than two million adults and 15 million children in the United States are exposed to domestic violence. One in three adult Texans has experienced intimate partner violence in their lifetime. A 2011 study at the University of Texas estimates 5.9% of all Texans are currently in an abusive relationship.

In the past year, almost 223,000 Texans called family violence hotlines, and over 79,000 people — primarily women and children — sought services from family violence programs because they did not feel safe in their homes. Furthermore, the 2011 National Census on Domestic Violence Services found that Texas programs served 5,598 family violence victims in a single day. These numbers are alarming, but also consider that the Texas Health and Human Services Commission reported 8,028 unmet requests for help in fiscal year 2012. Moreover, 45% of family violence programs in Texas report insufficient funding for needed programs/services.

TCFV diligently confirms the accuracy of the information in this report. Law enforcement departments track homicides through the Unified Crime Report and send information to the Texas Department of Public Safety (DPS). DPS provides TCFV with this data, identifying jurisdiction, gender, victim and the perpetrator’s relationship to the victim. TCFV simultaneously collects media reports from across the state and cross-checks the information against the raw TDPS data. In addition, TCFV contacts individual law enforcement agencies to collect as much information about the crime as possible. Finally, as an additional measure of fact-checking, TCFV sent the list of women killed to the executive directors of family violence programs for their review and contacted key district attorneys around Texas for additional information. This multi-layered process allows TCFV to obtain a full and accurate picture of these deaths. This report contains the most accurate information available to TCFV staff at the time of compilation.

Honoring Texas Victims: Family Violence Fatalities in 2011 key characteristics and analyses:

- Victim’s age
- Relationship to perpetrator
- Fatalities by month
- County analysis
- Causes of death
- Murder-suicides
- Protective orders and offenders’ possession of firearms
- Related victims
- Children

In addition, this report draws attention to promising strategies in Texas. Only when we act on what we have learned do we honor the lives that have been lost, work toward justice for survivors of domestic violence and build communities that will support safe, loving and respectful relationships for all.

Texas Femicide Victims of Family Violence 2011

An iconic symbol in and of itself, the map of Texas drives much of our collective consciousness and understanding of ourselves as a state and as a people. TCFV has taken this Texas map and shaded those counties in which no fatalities occurred in 2011 the color purple. For those involved in efforts to end domestic violence, purple represents a uniting hue for the purposes of awareness and activism. White counties mark the killing of at least one woman. TCFV calls on each of us to imagine a state in which all counties (and our entire state) GO PURPLE.

We challenge all of Texas to Go Purple and strive for a state where no woman loses her life as a result of family violence.
Characteristics of Victims/Perpetrators

Victim’s Age
In analyzing the 2011 fatalities, victims’ ages ranged from 16 to 78 years. Five women under the age of 20 were murdered, one a minor. There was one 16-year-old, two 18-year-olds, and two 19-year-olds. All were murdered by a boyfriend. The eldest victim, a 78-year-old woman, was murdered by her husband. The age group most impacted is 30 to 39 years of age, followed by 20 to 29, and then 40 to 49 years of age. In reviewing the data, 63% of women killed were under the age of 40, a shift from 2010, where 49% of women were under the age of 40. Significantly, note that the age group 60 to 69 did not experience a fatality, indicating a 10-year-age span with no deaths. However, there were fatalities to women who were 70, 71, 74 and 78, demonstrating particular vulnerability for these elder victims.

Number of Family Violence Deaths by Month
Fatalities occurred throughout the year, but the data demonstrates that in 2011 the highest number of femicides occurred in May (15), followed by December (11) and June (10). TCFV continues to track this information to identify trends and patterns. To date, no such trend or pattern has emerged.
Victim’s Relationship to the Perpetrator

“Wife” represents the most common relationship of the victim to the perpetrator (48%), followed by “girlfriend” (34%), ex-girlfriend (12%) and then ex-wife (5%). At the time of this report, authorities were unable to determine the exact intimate relationship in one percent of the cases. A total of 82% of this year’s femicides happened to women in a current relationship or who had not formally ended their relationship with their killer (“girlfriend” category combined with “wife” category).

Overall, women experience an increased risk of lethal violence when they leave intimate relationships with men.\[^{[8]}\] Multiple researchers and advocates with direct services experiences also agree that further increased lethality develops as a woman employs strategies for establishing greater independence and toward leaving her abuser.\[^{[9]}\] Law enforcement and media reports often contain limited information addressing whether the victim was contemporaneously attempting to leave the abuser when he killed her; however, this report affirmatively documents that three of the murdered women (3%) were contemporaneously trying to leave their abusive partner and 17% of the women had already ended the relationship. Importantly, many women in the remaining 82% (girlfriend and wife) likely had taken initial steps to establish independence or had actually left or ended the relationship but had not taken formal steps such as divorce proceedings.

Number of Family Violence Deaths by Counties

In 2011, the data shows five counties with large urban cities had the highest number of women killed by their intimate partner. Harris County, which includes the city of Houston, experienced the highest number of deaths (23), followed by Tarrant County (9), which includes Fort Worth and Arlington, Dallas County (8), which includes the city of Dallas, Travis County (6), which includes Austin and Bexar County (6), which includes San Antonio.

Many counties (25) of varying sizes and populations experienced only one femicide this year. Of these, five counties also had one murder last year. Conversely, 24 counties recorded a murder in 2010 but did not have one in 2011.

Although this section of the report chiefly notes geographic information rather than a per capita analysis, consider these demographics for two distinct counties in which women were killed in 2011:

In responding to fatalities in various communities in Texas, the death of even one woman at the hand of her intimate partner fractures and traumatizes that community. Those ramifications affect communities of various sizes in differing, yet real ways. Recall that Texas defines 177 counties as “Metropolitan” and 77 as “Non-Metropolitan.”¹² Service provision and response to violence in some counties involves responding to large numbers of diverse women needing help and yearly coping with the loss of multiple women.

In other less populated communities, the overall number of women needing help and who are killed is lower, yet challenges of distance and lack of specialized response create their own degree of lethality. One person killed in a given year represents to that community a bigger proportion of their population, yet a femicide may not have occurred in that community for years prior. Moreover, in less populated communities, the chances increase that surviving individuals in the community knew the victim, killer and others present or involved in the murder, thereby affecting an even more scarring result on individuals.

Cause of Death/Firearms

The 2011 Texas data indicates that perpetrators used firearms in 66 (64%) of the 102 cases. In comparison to data from 2010, the number of women killed by firearms has remained alarmingly consistent. In 2011, perpetrators stabbed and killed their partners in 15 cases (15%).

This report recounts the cause of death or weapon used in family violence related fatalities. The data shows that unfortunately most domestic violence homicides in Texas involve a gun. The same can be said at the national level. In fact, one 2010 national study that analyzed all kinds of murders in which women were the victims, found that within their analysis sample more than two-thirds of femicide victims were murdered by male intimate partners with a firearm. In this study, the number of women shot and killed by their husband or intimate acquaintance (574 victims) was nearly six times higher than the total number murdered by male strangers using all weapons combined (98 victims) in single victim and single offender incidents in 2010.

In order of prevalence in Texas in 2011, additional causes or methods of death included stabbed (15), beaten (3), and strangled (6). One significant and alarming trend this year involved the incidence of using fire as a part of the murder either using it to kill and/or destroy evidence.

Murder-Suicides

This report identifies murder-suicides as an instance where the perpetrator killed his intimate partner then killed himself. There were 40 family violence murder-suicides in 2011 in Texas, 39% of the total fatalities in this report. Thirty-seven women were shot, two were strangled and one was beaten. Of the perpetrators, 37 shot themselves, two hung themselves and one died in his vehicle fleeing police. Four additional perpetrators attempted suicide but survived.

Research indicates most murder-suicides result from family violence. In a 2011 national study, 72% of all murder-suicides involved an intimate partner. Of those intimate partner murder-suicides, 94% were females killed by their intimate partners. The National Institute of Justice lists common characteristics of offenders in family violence murder-suicide cases:

- Prior history of family violence
- Access to a gun
- Threats, especially increased threats with increased specificity
- Prior history of poor mental health or substance abuse, especially alcohol

A prior history of family violence represents the greatest risk factor for family violence murder-suicide; access to a gun increases the likelihood of a murder-suicide. More than one national study has found that killers use a firearm in over 85% of murder-suicides.

Perpetrator’s History of Family Violence
A history of family violence represents the most common risk factor for family violence homicide.¹⁹ In Texas, the perpetrator had a history of violence in 16% of the cases of women killed during 2011. It is an unfortunate reality that a woman may attempt to leave her abusive partner several times without success; increased lethality in planning or attempting to leave, dependence on the batterer for money and other support, possible immigration consequences, experiencing the ridicule or negative judgment from families, friends and community members and the sheer complexity and possible negative consequences of navigating the criminal and civil justice systems represent just a few of the reasons a woman may make the difficult but reasonable decision not to leave.

Familicide and Related Victims
Familicide refers to the deliberate killing of a current or former intimate partner and one or more of their children followed by suicide of the perpetrator: an annihilation of the nuclear family. National statistics demonstrate the rare nature of familicide cases.²⁰ Notably in 2011, Texas marked six incidents of familicide — a remarkable increase from the prior year total of one. In three cases, police and media reports suggest the children, who were 18 years-of-age or older, may have been the victim’s children only. In the remaining three incidents, the children ranged in age from one to 19, and were children of the victim and perpetrator. Recall this report is dedicated to the four deceased Gonzalez children,* from the tragic incident in which their mother, Laura Gonzalez, survived the brutal attack. Incredibly Laura survived, otherwise she would have joined the six other women whose families were killed along with the mother. These cases deeply affected their communities. Simply put, these events insult the sensibility of rational individuals and shock our individual and collective consciousness. In his book on this topic, Familicidal Hearts: the Emotional Styles of 211 Killers, Dr. Neil Websdale underscores these points:

• Intimate partner violence precedes most familicides.
• Men are responsible for 95% of all familicidal killings. This glaring under-representation of women as perpetrators mirrors their absence in serial, mass and spree killers.
• Familicides haunt communities because of the intensity of their illogic. Killing a partner is one thing. Murdering children and then taking one’s life destroys lineage and eliminates new blood.

Although Dr. Websdale identifies the need for additional research, the fact that familicide appears to have increased over the last four decades, while intimate partner killings as a whole have declined, seems paradoxical. Intuitively, this draws a parallel — this is the same time period over which domestic violence services have significantly evolved. Dr. Richard Gelles, Dean of The School of Social Policy & Practice, University of Pennsylvania adds, “The power and control familicides can be pretty brutal and pretty bloody, essentially sending a message: you failed me, and I’m taking you out.”²¹

Distinct from familicides, perpetrators who kill their intimate partner also too often take the lives of other people as well. In this report, TCFV identified nine incidents of this nature. Nine perpetrators killed their intimate partner and 17 other people. Victims included 12 family members, four friends and one co-worker.

“Secondary” victim is a term frequently used to identify other parties impacted through a primary individual’s victimization. TCFV declines to use this term as it may unintentionally denote these deaths as less important. For this report, TCFV refers instead to other parties as “related victims.” For this report, related victims describes others that may have been hurt or killed and may have a familial relationship with the woman killed or are now related to the fatality as a result of their own injury or death. The following chart provides a fuller impact of domestic violence fatalities by identifying who else was present, hurt, killed or a witness to the murder.

In addition to the previously discussed 102 women killed by their intimate partner, there were 26 related victims killed in 2011. This report names teen victims whose deaths were perpetrated by a current or former boyfriend and also reports the names of minor perpetrators. However, the report does not include the names of minors killed, noting them as “son” or “daughter”.

With care and respect, TCFV acknowledges the loss of these lives.

Children Who Lost Their Mothers and Children Present During the Murder

TCFV and its partners at the local, state and national levels have increasingly addressed and worked toward solutions regarding service provision and advocacy for domestic violence survivors and their children who may witness domestic violence. In pursuit of these efforts, TCFV participated strongly in the SB434 Task Force to Address the Relationship Between Domestic Violence and Child Abuse and Neglect, a statutorily mandated collection of staff from child advocacy groups, Child Protective Services, The Health and Human Services Commission, university professionals, law enforcement, family violence programs and survivors. The effort stemmed from a realization that the system currently in place too often fostered the re-victimization of battered women within the child protective service realm and ultimately did not promote long-term positive and permanent solutions for the child.

The resulting report posits, “The challenge in providing intervention is maintaining child safety and enhancing the protective capacity of the adult victim of domestic violence while at the same time holding the alleged perpetrator accountable, without escalating the perpetrator’s violent behavior.” In pursuit of its charge, the SB434 Task Force developed the following starting points:

- Enhancing the safety of the parent who is a victim of domestic violence enhances the child’s safety. It is key that CPS accurately assess the efforts that a parent who is a victim of domestic violence is exhibiting to protect the child from direct harm.
- A child should remain in the care of an adult victim of domestic violence who demonstrates sufficient protective capacities to keep the child safe, consistent with the safety and best interest of the child.
- Domestic violence perpetrators impact the safety and well-being of children and should be held accountable for their actions on the safety and well-being of both the adult victim of domestic violence and child victims.
- In addition to appropriate services provided to the child, appropriate services should be made available to the adult victim of domestic violence to enhance that victim’s safety and parental protective capacities.

It is with these efforts and points of view in mind that TCFV identifies, strategizes and forges solutions related to children who witness domestic violence.

Certainly the problem persists and children deserve remedies resulting from our best thinking and actions. Consider that in 2011, based on information from police and media reports, 56 of the women killed had children. Of these cases, note that 48 children were present or witnessed the event. Two of the 56 women killed had adult children who witnessed the offense. One killer murdered his partner with her 9-month-old present. The 56 women killed were survived by a total of 131 children and one grandchild.

More broadly, we know that almost one in four children are exposed to family violence between the ages of zero to 12. Ninety percent of children exposed to violence between their mother and an intimate partner saw the violence. Family violence carries with it immediate and long-term emotional, physical, psychological and social effects on children as well as the non-abusing parent.

Children who lose a parent to domestic violence cope with the loss of their parent and with the social and legal consequences of the death. Violence exacerbates the emotions and grief they experience along with the complexity of their resulting life situation. While coping with their mother’s death, they move to a new home with family or foster care and may face questions or possibly participate as a witness in the investigation and prosecution of the death. Physical manifestations of the trauma they witness certainly develop in children exposed to domestic violence.\[26\]

In accord with the SB434 Task Force’s assertions above, the National Council of Juvenile and Family Court Judges said, “T[he effects of exposure to domestic violence may be moderated by the presence of a consistent and caring adult, often the non-offending parent, opportunities for healing and success, and the existence of assets in the community, including social and extended family supports and skilled interventionists.”\[27\]

Protective Orders and Offenders’ Possession of Firearms

As mentioned above, TCFV employs a process for determining the details of the women killed in Texas: incorporating DPS UCR data, tracking media reports, speaking with local law enforcement and prosecutors and contacting local domestic violence program executive directors. Despite this great diligence, TCFV does not have a definitive determination regarding the number of women killed while they had active protective orders against their killer.

TCFV has identified four instances of this in 2011. More instances may have occurred.

In these four instances, killers used a firearm in two of the killings. The tragedy of these deaths becomes even more stark in contemplation of the federal and state prohibitions regarding possession of firearms while the subject of a protective order. Texas and federal laws make it illegal for offenders who are subject to a family violence protective order or who have been convicted of family violence to possess firearms.\[28\]

In recognition of often long-term abuse, Texas recently added Family Code Section 85.025 which allows some survivors to obtain a protective order for a period greater than the two years that were previously possible. In addition, many have called for a harsher offense that punishes offenders that violate their protective orders twice or more in a 12-month-period and before each individual offense has been completely adjudicated. TCFV is currently evaluating whether to adopt this idea for its legislative agenda for the 83rd Session of the Texas legislature.

\[28\] 18 U.S.C. § 922(d)(8)-(g)(8)-(9) (2009); Tex. Penal Code §46.04(b)-(c). However, law enforcement and military officers may possess firearms while a protective order is in place. (18 U.S.C. § 925(a)(1) (2009); Tex. Penal Code § 46.04(c)). Under Texas law, an offender convicted of a family violence misdemeanor cannot possess a firearm for a period of five years after release from jail or community supervision. (Tex. Penal Code §46.04(b)). Under federal law, an offender convicted of committing a domestic violence misdemeanor may never again possess a firearm or ammunition. This category of firearm prohibition is retroactive and applies to everyone. Thus, if a convicted Texas family violence offender possesses a firearm or ammunition after the five year state law moratorium, it is nevertheless still a federal offense. (18 U.S.C. § 922(d)(8)-(g)(8)-(9) (2009)).
Reflections on the 2011 Honoring Texas Victims

_Honoring Texas Victims: Family Violence Fatalities in 2011_ forces us to examine the deaths of the 102 women killed as well as the greater impact these fatalities leave in their wake. This difficult examination builds durable and direct paths forward. More importantly, by closing the gaps where future victims may slip through, we close the same gaps perpetrators look for to continue their violence.

During the analysis of these tragic events, several aspects became particularly poignant:

- Clearly perpetrators look for areas that maximize privacy (and thus isolation of their victims) to commit their violent acts. The majority of these criminal acts occurred in the home. Ten women were shot in their vehicles and another two were dragged or run over with a vehicle. Fewer women were killed in the public sphere: four women were killed at a place of employment; one each in a hospital, skating rink and the middle of the street in separate incidents.
- Fire was a factor in five cases, either in an attempt to hide evidence or to further defile the victim. In one particular case, it caused the death of the one-year-old son of the victim.
- Six perpetrators remained at large when the murder was reported in the press or afterward, further endangering the communities.
- The incidence in familicide increased. Six cases were particularly disturbing in that the term “annihilation of the nuclear family” most adequately describes them.
- In addition to familicide, the batterer killed other non-family members in nine cases. Particular brutality and destruction mark these nine cases.

Importantly, TCFV did not include the deaths of two women ages 42 and 48 in the narrative section of this report. One woman was shot and the other beaten. Authorities reported insufficient evidence to formally charge their husbands, yet investigation continues on both of these cases. TCFV marks their deaths nonetheless.

Strategies for a Safer Texas

TCFV takes seriously the need to not only mark the tragic deaths of 102 women who were killed by their intimate partners, but to also offer a path forward from these needless deaths. In many ways, Texas employs time-tested and effective responses to family violence at all levels. Take for instances some of the statistics mentioned at the beginning of this report. We cannot overstate the fact that over 79,000 victims and their families obtained safety in a patchwork quilt of over 100 family violence shelters and resource centers across Texas. Our partners in law enforcement came to the rescue in over 190,000 family violence calls. Similar numbers exist for prosecutors and the judiciary. Only 35 years ago, none of these options existed.

TCFV celebrates how far we have come while simultaneously maintaining a forward-looking approach to implementing innovative practices. The following three examples represent only a small portion of many creative and strategic practices communities in Texas are employing.

Domestic Violence Fatality Review

Realizing 102 women were killed by their intimate partner in 2011, Texans face the responsibility to take these deaths seriously. Fashioning efficient, effective and proactive responses and approaches represents a hallmark of a Texan ethic that we must continue to apply to family violence. Our state’s system of lifesaving family violence shelter and resource centers combined with robust law enforcement, prosecutor, probation, judiciary, education and health response all demonstrate continuing strong commitment. But the fact remains that too many women died last year at the hands of their intimate partners and too many families must access shelter or resource centers or call the police to get safe. Across Texas, members of the coordinated community response to domestic violence continually look for ways to prevent and address fatalities. Domestic Violence Fatality Review (DVFR) in Texas represents an increasingly implemented and valued way for communities to come together to soberly and non-judgmentally examine the facts and practices related to response to domestic violence prior to a specific fatality.

Simply put, DVFRs are locally-run groups of community partners such as family violence programs, law enforcement, prosecutors, judges, probation staff, educators, CPS staff, community activists and others. They come together on a regular basis to take a close look at the facts and circumstances leading up to and contributing to a specific intimate partner fatality that occurred in that community. By reviewing domestic violence fatalities, participants quickly identify cross-response patterns and realities with an eye towards making necessary policy and procedure changes.

A Few Frequently Asked Questions

What is a domestic violence fatality review?
Domestic violence fatality review is a process for examination of the systemic interventions into known prior incidents of family violence, the consideration of a changed systemic response to stop future domestic violence deaths and for recommendations for coordinated community prevention and intervention initiatives to end domestic violence. This definition is taken from the National Domestic Violence Fatality Review Institute website: www.ndvfri.org.

How does a domestic violence fatality review really work?
Each domestic violence fatality review team must agree to protocols for administering the review. While teams may agree to meet as often as they want, the statute requires that they meet “on a regular basis.” They can agree to review only some of the domestic violence fatalities that take place in their community. They can agree to review every detail of a few cases, a few details of many cases or a combination of approaches. They can review suicides related to domestic violence. Teams can review fatalities that occurred as a result of the realities of domestic violence such as a victim dying from exposure after she fled from her batterer. Domestic violence fatality review teams have leeway in the cases they review. For more specific information regarding DVFRs, take a look at Texas Health and Safety Code Section 672 which covers the general framework for domestic violence fatality review in Texas.

Why create a domestic violence fatality review?
Domestic violence fatality reviews encourage a coordinated community response. In the administration of Violence Against Women Act (VAWA) and Victim of Crime Act (VOCA) funding, the Governor’s office strongly advocates that recipients employ a coordinated community response to domestic violence. Avoiding a “siloed” approach is a strong component of Texas’ approach to domestic violence. Practically, this means all parties should talk and work together in a concerted, regular and strategic manner. No victim of family violence can have his or her needs met by any one part of the domestic violence services in a community.

For instance, while shelter services can greatly help to increase safety, temporary shelter can only last so long. Long-term safety and eventual stability rely on the prosecuting attorney holding the offender accountable and helping to secure a protective order for the victim, on law enforcement checking in with the victim and answering emergency calls if necessary and other integral participants in victim services. Information and procedures that work for one agency may make no sense to another agency and may actually hurt the victim. In order to assure the best response to victims of family violence, the various community partners should constantly look inward at themselves and outward to each other.
Domestic violence fatality review work fosters an environment in which this occurs. Participants begin to connect the dots between those with whom they need to develop, cultivate and continue relationships; cell phone numbers and email addresses are exchanged. Rapport develops amongst the participants. Family violence shelter and resource center programs particularly benefit from getting a seat at a table that may not otherwise be available to them. Lessons learned: the review process encourages an introspection that does not always occur. Domestic violence service providers including law enforcement and prosecution (amongst others) tend to be understaffed and overworked; making sure they meet the safety needs of victims obviously represents a dominating goal. But by stepping back from the actual delivery of the services, law enforcement, prosecutors, family violence programs and all members of the review can begin to see trends and understand them in a manner that may not otherwise happen.

Taking all family violence seriously, participants quickly begin to realize that every case coming through their door, even a class C misdemeanor where the offender threatened to slap the victim or squeezed her arms must be taken seriously.

Who participates in domestic violence fatality reviews in Texas?
The individual community in which the review operates determines the review’s membership. Useful participants include but are not limited to: family violence program staff (from shelters, resources centers and Battering Intervention Prevention Programs), police officers, police detectives, sheriffs and their deputies, prosecutors (assistant district attorneys, county attorneys and city attorneys), district court and county court judges (both criminal and civil), educators (primary, secondary, and university level), child protective services personnel, community activists, medical examiners, community supervision (probation) personnel, military victim services personnel, hospital personnel, advocates from the attorney general’s office, emergency medical technicians and 911 call operators.

For more FAQ’s, visit www.tcfv.org and click on the “Resources” tab. For more information on how to start a DVFR in your community, contact TCFV Policy Director Aaron Setliff at 1-800-525-1976 or by email atasetliff@tcfv.org.

Healthcare Assessment and Response
For many women, pregnancy is one of the few times during their lifetime that they will receive specialized medical attention, and thus health care providers are uniquely positioned to provide women access to support, resources and information — an important step in taking control of their own health and safety. Initiatives that support health care providers to provide universal education to patients on the relationship between health and violence and the resources available is another promising practice to aid in early detection and prevention of domestic violence. Similarly, building the capacity of home visitors, or promotoras, to understand the dynamics of violence can assist in early intervention in young families before violence escalates to fatal ends. It is well documented that pregnancy is a time of increased risk and vulnerability for women in abusive relationships. Taking advantage of these opportunities presented in the health sector can provide women access to key resources to improve their health and well-being during and after pregnancy and can connect them to support systems in their community, a critical protective factor against domestic violence. For more information about health care provider trainings, contact TCFV Prevention Director Surabhi Kukke at 512-794-1133 or skukke@tcfv.org.

The 24 Hour Initiative
Many parts of the state have instituted innovative practices to address the prevalence of femicides in Texas. One important, nationally-recognized approach is the 24 Hour Initiative, a program pioneered in El Paso by District Attorney Jaime Esparza. This approach has served as a basis for best prosecutorial practices that have informed and guided the efforts of law enforcement and prosecutors in several other parts of the state.

In short, the Initiative applies many of the lessons prosecutors and advocates have learned make a difference when it comes to victim safety and offender accountability in the criminal justice process. Within 24 hours of a family violence offense, staff from the DA’s office makes a visit to the home of the victim in order to offer information and resources and reassurance the district attorney takes the case seriously. This is also a message to the offender, who may live at the same residence, so trained law enforcement staff from the DA’s office accompanies advocates for these visits. In addition,
Mr. Esparza and a small team of staff review every single family violence case within one to two days (depending on if the offense happened on the weekend) after it happens. At these meetings, the team collects or identifies needed evidence for the prosecution, such as photographs, medical records, other victim statements and on-scene video of the victim’s story, with the priority to have everything needed to prosecute the case within days. The chief of the family violence unit then works with assistant district attorneys to support their efforts in court. Overall, this methodology operationalizes the realization that long delays in the prosecution of family violence cases decrease victim safety and offender accountability.

The University of Texas at Austin Institute on Domestic Violence and Sexual Assault (IDVSA) studied the Initiative, issuing the following summary of the program and its successes:

The 24 Hour Contact Domestic Violence Initiative (24 Hour Contact) is an innovative program that seeks to respond to family violence crimes in ways that hold offenders accountable and restores victims. Its strengths should not be understated. The program provides a new model for the efficacy of handling family violence cases from the prosecution viewpoint, brings increased attention to these crimes within the criminal justice system and the community at large, and shows the benefits of increased community-wide collaboration to address these issues. ...[T]he evidence shows that victim needs are being met in helpful ways, offenders are being held accountable, and a community shift regarding family violence is occurring. What is most remarkable about the program is the dedication and passion that those in the District Attorney’s Office, and the district attorney himself, exhibit on a daily basis in addressing family violence in the greater El Paso community.

IDVSA issued the following findings in its report on the Initiative:

1. Implementation of the 24 Hour Contact program has instituted a noteworthy paradigm shift in El Paso, where family violence is viewed as a serious and prosecutable crime that will not be easily dismissed and for which offenders will be held accountable for their crimes of violence. The program also has altered legal practices by criminal justice professionals — including ADAs, law enforcement, and defense attorneys — and increased skill-building, peer support, and mentorship within the District Attorney’s Office. Unfortunately, myths about family violence persist, so efforts to address these myths should continue.

2. The 24 Hour Contact program provides significant emotional support to family violence victims and increases their access to important community and financial resources.

3. Collaborations among key players in the criminal justice system and community victim service providers (e.g., law enforcement, local family violence shelter, probation, and the Battering Intervention and Prevention Program) have been considerably strengthened as a result of the program.

4. The prosecution of family violence has been significantly enhanced through the collection of better evidence, an increase in evidence gathering, improved preparation of case files, and an increase in preparedness and effectiveness of ADAs for trial.

Acknowledgements

This report would not be possible without the contributions of many law enforcement and domestic violence agencies and other personnel who supported efforts to collect the most accurate data possible. TCFV wants to extend special thanks to Lolli Hodge in the Portland Police Department Records Division and Sergeant Melissa L. Holbrook of the Special Crimes Division Family Violence Unit at the Harris County Police Department.
An Introduction to Their Stories

The Texas Council on Family Violence humbly offers the stories of the women killed by intimate partners in 2011. Since 1990, TCFV has collected these stories so that Texans can properly observe the passing of these women and forge a way forward, realizing and knowing where we have been. In each note, find the county, date, woman’s name and a short summary of the killing; the order is alphabetical and by county name.
